

When refugees come to a new country, they are faced with the daunting task of finding secure employment, on top of learning a new language and creating a new home for themselves. Being unable to find employment may lead to social and cultural isolation as well as long-term feelings of hopelessness and rejection that may then spiral into extremism as an alternative escape. ReEmploy provides local job opportunities to refugees as a means of expanding and building their local network for resettlement and community engagement.

"The language barrier was the hardest part of getting a job, so having something to alleviate that really helps" - T. Dang, refugee

A "Humans of New York" style story can be published about each refugee so the people hiring them can learn about their stories and better empathize with their situations.

ReEmploy: A refugee networking platform

Smart search enables the optimal match between refugee and employer based on preferred needs and priorities as well as assist in onboarding.

One cause of radicalization is an individual's feelings of social isolation. Connecting refugees with past employers allows skill-sharing and human connection to reduce social isolation.

In addition to standard ratings and reviews, employers can message past employers in the refugee's network to ensure credibility.
